Consequently, the results of the present study indicate that the use of the in vitro model to predict the outcome of the in vivo situation is not always reliable.

They are not the same, however, because the former is a generalization, while the latter is a specific instance of the former.

Other than a few minor differences, the two versions are identical. The primary difference is that the second version includes a few additional lines of code that are not present in the first version. These additional lines of code are used to handle the case where the user enters a character that is not a digit or a decimal point. The first version does not handle this case, and will result in an error if the user enters a non-digit character.

These increased concentrations increased the total concentrations of monosaccharides in the culture media, which were measured by colorimetric assays. After the treatments, the culture media contained glucose, fructose and galactose, with the total monosaccharide content of approximately 1000 mg/L. Glucose was the major monosaccharide, being approximately 60% of the total. Fructose and galactose were the minor monosaccharides, being approximately 20% and 20% of the total, respectively. The total monosaccharide content of the culture media increased with time, reaching a plateau after 10 days (Figure 1). Glucose was the major monosaccharide, being approximately 60% of the total.
