1. Discuss how explorers' the following nations' motives for exploration differed from one another during the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries:
 - Portugal: Vasco da Gama, Christopher Columbus was the first European to sail to Asia. His route is largely ignored in the world because this that the Portuguese, Spanish, French, British, and French first established their trade networks and take advantage of the native people instead and a different time with social anthropological studies and the concepts of the hierarchy of power.
 - Christopher Columbus: while he was already Italian, he was hired by the Spanish to find a new route to India. He was believed to make it to Asia, but actually just made it to the Caribbean. He is therefore sometimes referred to as "discovering this new world." This impacted their new location greatly as it opened more pathways to colonization following years of their own colonies, plantations, and mines and helped the native people.
 - England: John Cabot came directly from Venice, and was hired by King Henry VII of England to explore northern England coastline. This is significant because England would eventually gain control of this entire northern coast of the northern sea and start their first 13 colonies.
2. Identify and describe at least 3 major differences between the Spanish empire and Portuguese empire:
 - Portugal: started by Prince Henry, the Navigator, who had the right to monopolize empire, starting with the exploration of the coast of Africa to search for gold, reaching the coast of the Portuguese where trade that would monopolize empires. They eventually discovered it was better to sail this way the "back route." They wanted to trade and trade gold, ivory, and slaves. Several years later they reached the coast of gold and silver and began to colonize across from India and eventually in Southeast Asia, reaching and taking over in Asia. Eventually reaching parts further west, they discovered the spice trade and India and up this entire side to help of plantation and resources. The Portuguese were mostly going to and that gold and military forces, but ultimately were too weak for countries with a higher population, more resources, and the determination to establish empires.
 - Spain: began their exploration after Portugal but quickly caught up with them due to their greater population and resources. They began reaching the coastways to discover the west and finally realized they could monopolize this by sailing west. Christopher Columbus, a Genoese city Spain, convinced the Spanish and reached what the believed was Asia, but was actually the Caribbean. Eventually people caught on and Portugal and Spain formed an the world's exploration through the theory of "discovery," leaving Spain with much of North and Central America, Portugal with the South.
