

1. Definition: A substitution cipher is a type of cipher where each letter in the plaintext is replaced by another letter. This is done using a key, which is a sequence of letters that determines the substitution.

2. Example: Let's take the plaintext "HELLO" and the key "KLMN". The ciphertext would be "KLNLM".

3. Types: There are two main types of substitution ciphers: monoalphabetic and polyalphabetic. Monoalphabetic ciphers use a single key for the entire message, while polyalphabetic ciphers use multiple keys.

4. Security: Substitution ciphers are generally considered to be less secure than other types of ciphers, such as transposition ciphers or stream ciphers. This is because they are vulnerable to frequency analysis, which is a technique used to break ciphers by analyzing the frequency of letters in the ciphertext.

5. Applications: Substitution ciphers have been used in many different contexts, including secret communication, data encryption, and password protection.
