

The World's First Global Age

The period of 1400 to 1500 is largely defined by the increased international and transnational trade as global trade networks linked distant continents and exchanges between people and cultures across the world.

Major Regions of Global Trade and Expansion:

North America: Indigenous North American and Mesoamerican peoples were increasingly integrated in trade with European powers during the first global age. The 15th-century exploration efforts centered on reaching Asia reached by Europe, England and Spain, while South America was reached by Spain and Portugal.

West Africa: European nations sought routes to establish colonies and trade relations for goods like gold, ivory, and slaves. These efforts eventually opened the Atlantic Ocean to trade.

Western Europe: Nations like Italy and Spain emerged, powered by a desire to expand through trade and exploration. Key players in establishing the Atlantic, especially Portugal and Spain, were the first to establish trade routes connecting Europe to the Americas and beyond.

Eastern Africa and Southeast Asia: The Ottoman Empire controlled trade routes to the Indian Ocean, linking Europe and Asia. The Portuguese and Spanish were the first to establish trade routes to the East along the African and Asian continents, the Atlantic Ocean and Indian Ocean (1492-1500).
