

of the 1990s. The following statement from the 1997 Annual Report of the National Institute of Justice, for example, reflects the growing concern within law enforcement institutions over police employing the official definition of rape as sexual, forced, nonconsensual and non-animal force (including kidnapping, robbery, etc.). (Patterson et al. 1997:16) The following statement, however, from the 1997 Annual Report of the National Institute of Justice, reflects a somewhat more liberal perspective on rape, suggesting that sexual and non-animal force other than kidnapping, robbery, etc., are acceptable definitions for certain sex crimes. The growing acceptance of kidnapping and robbery definitions, however, provides a rationale for redefining and using other terms, using FBI 1994, 1995, 1996 and 1997 statistics, 1) the term 'sexual assault' (which includes rape, kidnapping, robbery, etc.) and 2) the term 'sexual violence' (which includes rape, kidnapping, robbery, etc.). These statistics are important, as they are the only ones available for the 1990s, and these are the only types of statistics that can be used to compare the 1990s with the 1980s, as well as the 1970s and 1960s.

From a cognitive perspective this also constitutes "understanding" the situation, particularly the case of PTA managers' reactions to people who had been sexually victimized by themselves. PTA managers have been more frequently found to make more positive than negative, damage minimization, and more neutral statements in the aftermath of rape than did the victimizing women. These categorical and dispositional findings are consistent with cognitive models of victimization and trauma. These cognitive reactions to trauma should nevertheless be considered as only one aspect of the broader cognitive process of recovery. Another aspect of the cognitive process is the ability to reflect more positively than negatively from the victimizing experience. This is the function of PTA. "Empathy" however can be cognitively threatening. These findings that managers, when faced with reflecting more positively than negatively from the victimizing experience, become judgmental and critical of the victim, are concerning. This following more positive or less critical view of the victim PTA managers are the same ones who did more sexual aggression. It seems nearly impossible for managers to remain neutral in the event of sexual assault and sexual aggression. However, given the recent research findings, it is clear that action plans must be more comprehensive than current policies.
