

The authors begin by relating their findings back to the overall purpose of the study, to develop "a framework for understanding how cultural synchronization between teachers and students influences classroom disciplinary actions." To that end, they identify several themes.

Patterns of cultural humor is the first theme and is illustrated with several transcriptions of interactions along with commentary explaining how they enabled the teacher to "build cultural bridges between students' home and school lives." They also explain how the use of dialect allows the teacher to emphasize expectations in meaningful ways. Her responses also "promoted and reaffirmed solidarity with her students." They note that humor may allow the teacher to be more authentic in the students' perceptions. The teacher also demonstrated how to use humor in place of overreacting to statements or actions that could be considered offensive or result in harsher disciplinary actions.

Demonstrations of affect and emotion was another major theme noted, also referred to in the literature as "warm demands." Again, a number of excerpts are provided to illustrate the presence of this theme in the teacher's actions. Of importance is the teacher's reprimands were generally met with solemnity and quiet when they were intended to get a serious reaction from students. The authors note such blunt and direct types of discipline are more common among urban African American students' homes.

In conclusion, the authors state that there is considerable divergence in this teacher's reactions to disciplinary situations than might be in less culturally responsive teachers. They assert their case study does help to establish that cultural synchronicity is important in effective classroom management. However, they also recognize their
