

Blood components:

In humans, blood is an opaque red fluid, freely flowing but denser and more viscous than water. The characteristic colour is imparted by hemoglobin, a unique iron-containing protein.

Hemoglobin brightens in colour when saturated with oxygen (oxyhemoglobin) and darkens when oxygen is removed (deoxyhemoglobin). For this reason, the partially deoxygenated blood from a vein is darker than oxygenated blood from an artery. The red blood cells (erythrocytes) constitute about 45 percent of the volume of the blood, and the remaining cells (white blood cells, or leukocytes, and platelets, or thrombocytes) less than 1 percent. The fluid portion, plasma, is an opaque, slightly cloudy, yellowish liquid. After a fatty meal, plasma cholesterol represents about 15 percent of the body (the blood is predominantly fat), and includes other substances that make up plasma (see fatty homeostatic notes).

The total amount of blood in humans varies with age, race, weight, body size, and other factors. But a rough average figure for adults is about 80 million per kilogram of body weight. The average young male has a plasma volume of about 30 million, and a red cell volume of about 50 million per kilogram of body weight. There is little variation in the blood volume of a healthy person over long periods, although each component of the blood is in a continuous state of flux. In particular, red cells rapidly move in and out of the bloodstream, returning to the bone with the red marrow. Thus plasma makes the blood "run" with minimum friction. The normal volume of blood per cent of body weight is roughly equivalent to the approximate blood loss in most haemorrhages. About 100 million (about a pint) of blood from normal blood donors is a feasible procedure. Blood volume is roughly constant after blood loss, unless there is plasma volume loss due to contraction of arteries, or fluid loss due to diarrhea. The amount of red cells is roughly 40 million million million. The vast area of capillary membranes, through which each person's body could pass in one hour, has all the plasma from the circulatory system. It has the other plasma proteins, in particular, serum albumin. Capillary membranes are impermeable to serum albumin, the concentration being equal to concentration of the plasma proteins. The opposite effect of serum albumin causes their relative concentration, supporting the hypothesis that it has to drive the fluid content out of the blood.
