

THE ULTIMATE GUIDE TO BECOMING A BLS INSTRUCTOR

PASSION FOR TEACHING

The knowledge you are equipping your students with is quite complex and vital to their success as healthcare practitioners. Even though you are teaching Basic Lifesaving Skills, there's nothing basic about it—these are complicated concepts that can be difficult to comprehend. As such, you must also be able to guide your students with diplomacy, respect, and resilience as you equip them with this essential information.

GET YOUR BLS CERTIFICATION

Before you jump to becoming a BLS instructor, you must first learn the basics yourself. You likely already know this, but if it has been two years since receiving your BLS certification, it might be time for a refresher course. BLS certifications are only valid for two years, so you will need to keep track of receiving continual renewals.

BASIC LIFESAVING SKILLS

There is so much to know, and that's why there are so many lessons. When you take a BLS class, you will learn a plethora of information that will provide you with the usefulness and ability to assist in most medical issues or emergencies. For example, you can learn how to administer CPR, perform the Heimlich maneuver, use an Automated External Defibrillator, provide first aid, and treat several other medical situations.

AHA COURS

While the first step in your ultimate guide to becoming a BLS instructor is to attain your BLS certification, there are some caveats to know. You must be careful as to where you choose to get your education. The most important thing you must be aware of is ensuring that your course is an American Heart Association course. Before you begin your search for the best training program, you must know that the American Heart Association does not certify courses from other organizations.
