Using CPL for String Rewriting and Script Injection

String rewriting on scripts allows certain keywords in the HTML malware to be replaced with innocuous substitutions, while script injection can override those functions typically used by malware to unpack itself and thus silently prevent the browser from executing them. Because a full implementation of these techniques is too large for this document, the following is a sample script to replace one string pattern ("string_pattern") and override the "read" JavaScript function.

<Rewrite> javascript.response_rewrite(on_if_found) proxy.address=
if(Debug.all) "Result" call a Function bypassthat_should()
    //Use nothing, we intend to disable the whole function
eval = bypassthat_should
else exit
<Rewrite> action.rewrite(on_if_found) regex.rewrite(regex_rewrite_on_if_found)
<Rewrite> url_pattern( transform_Script_string_replace rewrite_script_subscribing "REWRITE" "string_pattern"
exit <Rewrite> action.bypass(transform_bypass transform transform_bypass_on_if_found
<proxy>
    action.rewrite(on_if_found) action.bypass(transform_bypass)

Implementing Anti-Malware Protection

Assuming all the above levels of defense are applied, a significant reduction in malware can be achieved with ProxySG and BCWF alone; however, no solution is complete without leveraging the billions of dollars spent each year by the antivirus industry on signature and heuristic based detections. This is available via the Blue Coat ProxyAV.

Blue Coat recommends that all objects be subjected to such scanning regardless of their website of origin, or file type. The ProxySG + ProxyAV solution makes this workable via the "scan once, serve many" technology. Each time a browser request is received, the ProxySG checks its object store for a cached copy. If one is found that was analyzed with the most recent AV-heuristics engine version, it can be delivered immediately. If the object in cache was analyzed before an update to the AV-heuristics engine, then the object is re-analyzed before delivery to the user. For non-cacheable objects, a finger print cache is kept to avoid analyzing the same file on frequent requests. Once an AV-heuristics engine update occurs, the finger print cache for non-cacheable objects restarts. Note that ProxyAV has four options for analysis: it can scan, trickle-first, trickle-last or defer scan (for long-lived objects).
