For the second phase, we used a 100% matching criterion. This is the most conservative approach, as it requires that all the data points in the test set must be matched with the data points in the training set. This is a very strict criterion, and it is not always possible to find a match for all the data points in the test set. In such cases, the model will return a null vector for the test set. This is a common problem in machine learning, and it is often addressed by using a more lenient matching criterion or by using a different type of model.
