

Unit 1. Exploration of Drama: Bedroom Farce

'Bedroom Farce' by Alan Ayckbourn, is a play of simplicity. Three beds and four couples line the stage and we can immediately see that one couple flitters in and out of the other couples bedrooms causing chaos where ever they turn. The different visual interpretations are very similar, with the idea of three beds on stage. The main idea of the play is to ask the probing question of 'what makes a good and successful marriage?'.

Language is used in the play to create differences between the couples, which each represent a different generation or occupation. Ernest and Delia's (the older couple's) language is very old and classical, with Earnest showing his background as a public schoolboy with comments such as 'good lord' and when he compares Delia and Susannah to 'sleeping next to a girls dormitory'. Delia obviously has this problem quite a lot with her husband rambling on about the 'good old days', but it does not seem to affect her, so their relationship seems unscathed from what we see of their language. This juxtaposes with Nick and Jan for example, as he thinks it is acceptable to ask everything of his wife because of his position as a businessman. She quite obviously gets frustrated much like Trevor and Susannah who cannot stand each other, but cannot be without each other. The odd couple out is Kate and Malcolm, whose language towards each other is very informal and rather child like. 'you started it, no you started it! And their short and sharp lines (Ah!, What is it? Ah!, What?) this shows their childlike antics, much reminding me of the play 'Blue Remembered Hills', where adults play children, it seems as if the study of children's play has come across in the language of this couple. When I explored the language of Trevor, I played him as an eccentric with long rambling sentences fading out, symbolising his lack of understanding of everyone around him and how he just cannot understand half the time, people have not a clue of what he is talking about.

The Non-verbal communication of the couples are all very different as well. Malcolm and Kate are very frantic, running around like children, jumping up and down and their facial expressions are very obvious, much in the style of Brecht. This is the opposite to Nick and Jan who are very static due to
