Ross Johnson,Rand

Corporation, 1982. This report tests basic assumptions used by Western analysts in interpreting the Soviet media by bringing to bear new information derived from emigre interviews about the structure and inner workings of Soviet media and the political mechanisms by which the media are controlled. Section II reviews the mechanism of Party and state control over Soviet media in which formal censorship in fact plays a secondary role. Section III looks at the crucial role of the chief editor and the editorial processes he presides over. Section IV analyzes types of discussions, debates and controversies in Soviet media and considers their relationship to institutional personal and policy conflict. Appendix A contains a fuller description of the study approach. Appendix B provides a selective review of media related assumptions in a variety of Western Sovietological writings. Appendix C examines a presumptive doctored photograph incident. Appendix D provides a profile of one of the seemingly unorthodox Soviet journals Literaturnaia Gazeta Harper's, 1987
