our crops As the world watched the number of honey bees drop to an all time low we were forced to prepare for the so called bee apocalypse Save the bees everyone cried out as humanity retaliated en masse with picket signs bee feeders and fingers violently pointed at beekeepers for their role in the destruction of humanity To this day I still see the odd poster or fervent rant on social media describing how if the bees die we die with them It s a noble cause but one that was born of misunderstanding We will die off if we lose our pollinators but the problem is that humanity worries about and tries to save the wrong bees Hawaiian yellow faced bees and bumblebees are endangered Honey bees aren t weren t and never have been Beekeepers largely blamed for the bee apocalypse in the first place play a significant role in keeping them off that list I d love to paint us as the superheroes this world needs but let it be said that beekeepers though we aren t the problem aren t always the solution Wild honey bees in the United States are at risk of endangerment but it s mostly due to the destruction of their habitat Some industries that cause this are too big and bad for humble beekeepers to stop Still to give credit where credit is due beekeepers maintain honey bee populations and are therefore responsible for keeping the true bee apocalypse at bay This awareness has caused beekeeping as both a hobby and an industry to flare It s excellent that more people are taking an interest in bees and raising them but I worry that the road to Hell truly is paved with good intentions What happens when all the good souls looking to help the honey bees realize that their efforts weren t needed Will they abandon their hives in favor of the next hyped cause I hope not The threat remains though and that s why I must give you this warning Beekeeping is not for everyone Before you commit to it ask yourself why you re interested in it If saving the bees is your answer I m sorry but you might not have what it takes Beekeeping has existed since as far back as 2500 BCE Back then it was destructive and caused the downfall of many a colony The ultimate goal was to harvest honey no more no less It was only thousands of years later in the 18th century that designs for harmless hives made an appearance It took a while for beekeepers to acknowledge their efficiency but by the 19th century these structures became the norm Even so harvesting honey was still the top priority Our hives weren t designed to protect bees They were accepted as a way to get what we want from them without killing them That s what beekeepers do Naturally there will be exceptions to the rule but at its core beekeeping is a branch of agriculture It may be one of the kinder forms of husbandry but it s reaping nonetheless Immersing yourself in the fascinating world of honey bees and hives could be the most rewarding journey you embark on But it will only satisfy you if you understand that you can t fix something that s not broken Honey bees don t really need your help but you sure need theirs If you can respect them as the intelligent even dangerous creatures that they are instead of treating them as the helpless bugs the world insists they ve become you ll do just fine
