Analyzing design review conversations: Connecting design knowing, being and coaching

Whether they occur formally or informally in academic or professional settings, design review conversations are interactive performances between those who give and those who receive feedback, advice, critique, or mentoring. They are sites of authentic practice where design coaches (i.e., instructors, peers, experts, and industry or community stakeholders) implicitly or explicitly demonstrate or perform their design knowing and being, and make their accumulated experience, knowledge, competencies, values, and belief systems visible and shareable to others. They also provide a window into the insights coaches have about design learners as they seek to support them in becoming designers. For example, during a design review coaches readily identify problematic and promising aspects of a designer's work by drawing on repertoires of practice and knowledge to anticipate problems learners may encounter and ways to help them work through these problems. They point out features of a design that could be improved, push learners to justify their ideas about 'good design' more clearly and thoroughly, and praise design work by pointing to particular insights and choices. Design learners are also performing their design knowing and being - making visible their reasoning, perspectives, and habits of mind. Through design review conversations, learners are supported in revisiting and critically evaluating their design rationales, and making sense of design review experiences in ways that allow them to construct their own design thinking repertoire and evolving design identity.

Design review conversations are robust sites for investigation and action. They offer multiple lines of inquiry into the nature and nurture of design expertise – in ways that make manifest design thinking and ways of being and becoming, reveal interactions among personal-social-epistemic dimensions, and convey disciplinary values, norms, and expectations (Adams & Siddiqui, 2016). As a prevalent and common approach for helping designers to develop and demonstrate design expertise, they offer actionable insights that carry relevance across design domains. As such, design review conversations offer pathways for bridging the gap between design research and design practice.

The papers presented in this special edition all stem from the 10th Design Thinking Research Symposium (DTRS) held at Purdue University, Indiana, USA, in October 2014 in which participants shared a common dataset of design review conversations. This common dataset served a three-fold, interconnected purpose. First it provided a common focus of inquiry for researchers from a diverse range of perspectives working in their own domains including art, architecture, business, cognitive and learning sciences, communication, computer science, design, education, engineering, industrial and product design, informatics and computing, science and technology, and sociology. The dataset also fostered collaborative inquiry among these researchers as they came together to share their findings at the symposium and make connections across individual studies to link aspects of design inquiry, design discourse and interactions (involving humans and
