This chapter is difficult to read because it contains so many small, individualized biology stories. However, reading this chapter at least once and (or slowly) rereading it will suggest that perhaps the biology community has a different view of the world than we have. Read it slowly, and you will see the world differently.

- a. Direct Contact: Cells come into physical contact with one another through protein molecules on the membranes of one cell being recognized by the receptors of another cell. Cell-cell and cell-matrix.
- b. Chemical Signaling: Signaling molecules released by one cell act through the receptors that sit on other cells. Can be achieved by releasing cells, achieved by hormones or released from the same cell (auto). Includes growth factors and other ligands. Includes direct effects.
- c. Structural Signaling: is achieved when molecules that are acting in one cell surface directly with the receptors, interacting directly and local signaling molecules (growth factors). Signal molecules released from one cell are recognized and act through different cells.
- d. Synaptic Signaling: Cells of the nervous system release their contents into the synapse, ligands released from the synapse recognize the receptors of other cells in the synapse. Includes a release of neurotransmitter cells, a chemical synapse.
