

(a) Nine regions delineated by four planes.

(b) Anterior view of the nine regions showing the superficial organs

- The right hypochondriac region is located on the right side of the epigastric region, bounded by the right costal margin and the right midclavicular line.
- The left hypochondriac region is located on the left side of the epigastric region, bounded by the left costal margin and the left midclavicular line.
- The right lateral (umber) region is located on the right side of the epigastric region, bounded by the right costal margin and the right midaxillary line.
- The left lateral (umber) region is located on the left side of the epigastric region, bounded by the left costal margin and the left midaxillary line.
- The right inguinal (iliaic) region is located on the right side of the epigastric region, bounded by the right costal margin and the right inguinal line.
- The left inguinal (iliaic) region is located on the left side of the epigastric region, bounded by the left costal margin and the left inguinal line.
- The pubic (hypogastric) region is located in the center of the epigastric region, bounded by the two inguinal lines and the two midclavicular lines.

You may make mistakes and worse errors, but if you are right, you will master the subject.

Other Regions

In addition to the nine regions, smaller regions may be defined by opening the epigastric region. These will be described in the following sections.

- Orbital region: The region of the eye and orbit.
- Nasal region: The region of the nose.
- Orbicularis oris region: The region of the mouth.
- Midline regions: The regions in the midline of the body.
- Suprasternal region: The region just above the sternum.
