

HIGH-VOLTAGE SPARK PROTECTION

CLIPPING DIODES

Clipping diodes are used to limit the peak voltage of a waveform. For example, if the peak voltage of a sine wave is 100 V, the clipping diode will limit the peak voltage to 50 V. The diode is connected in series with the positive terminal of the sine wave. The diode will conduct current when the voltage across it is positive. This current will flow through the diode and the load, and the voltage across the load will be 50 V. The diode will not conduct current when the voltage across it is negative. In this case, the voltage across the load will be 100 V. The diode will conduct current again when the voltage across it becomes positive again. This process will continue, resulting in a clipped sine wave.

512 Chapter 12

CLIPPING DIODE The voltage across a diode is limited to the voltage required to forward bias the diode. If a diode is reverse biased, the forward voltage is 0.3 V. If the diode is made from germanium, the forward voltage is 0.1 V.

When diodes are used to limit a signal, the diodes are called clipping diodes. The diodes are connected in series with the positive terminal of the sine wave. The diodes are reverse biased when the voltage across them is positive. This causes the voltage across the load to be limited to the diode's forward voltage.

LIGHT-EMITTING DIODES

OPERATION An LED emits visible light energy during normal operation. Light-emitting diodes have a low forward voltage drop (typically 0.3 V) and are often driven by a current source. Light-emitting diodes (LEDs) release light when current flows through the diode in the forward bias direction. • SEE FIGURE 12-14.

The forward-bias voltage required for an LED ranges between 0.3 and 2.2 volts.

An LED will only light if the voltage at two points (junctions) measured in ohms 0.3 to 2.2 volts higher than the voltage on the negative (negative) terminals.
