Autres Temps Edith Wharton, 2018-02 At the start of Autres Temps Mrs Lidcote is arriving in New York on a steamer ship from Italy after a long self imposed exile Having fled New York s society years ago when she became an outcast following her divorce she is returning only after receiving news of her daughter s divorce and remarriage As the shapes of the city s skyline begin to emerge from the fog Mrs Lidcote is full of worry and unable to stop mulling over her past which she fears will become her daughter Leila s future When she shares these fears with an old friend Franklin whom she meets on the boat he tells her that times have changed that Leila won t face the same stigma and what s more he proposes to Mrs Lidcote She has a lot to think over and she begins to really wonder if she does have a chance of being accepted again by those who cut her out years ago of the Digital ID 809544 New York Public Library Why does Franklin try so hard to convince Mrs Lidcote that she is just being paranoid and is not a social outcast Does he really believe times have changed so much or is he just working towards his own goal of marrying her Maybe he is trying to convince himself Franklin Leila and the relative sent to collect her Susy all have in common an attitude of gaiety when it comes to Leila s new marriage They all try to convince Mrs Lidcote that she is hopelessly old fashioned and out of touch with the new way of doing things Mrs Lidcote starts to second guess herself until it becomes clear that she is being excluded from Leila s dinner party Why is everyone working so hard to convince her of something that doesn t seem to be true Instead of telling her mother directly that she should not attend her dinner party Leila insists that she must be too exhausted after her journey to come Does it seem that everyone is treating Mrs Lidcote like a child Why does Leila not think her mother will be able to see that she is being excluded Before she returns to Europe Franklin comes to Mrs Lidcote s hotel room to try once more to convince her that she will be accepted in society Despite what had happened at Leila s home Mrs Lidcote suddenly agrees and tells Franklin she wants to go downstairs right then and there to see some old acquaintances It is only then that Franklin balks and the truth is made clear he knows that she is still an outcast Was Mrs Lidcote really convinced or was she trying to test Franklin This

Murray, 1990 Autres Temps... Edith Wharton, 2021-03-21 Mrs. Lidcote, as the huge menacing mass of New York, defined itself far off across the waters, shrank back into her corner of the deck and sat listening with a kind of unreasoning terror to the steady onward drive of the screws. She had set out on the voyage quietly enough in what she called her reasonable mood, but the week at sea had given her too much time to think of things and had left her too long alone with the past. When she was alone it was always the past that occupied her. She couldn't get away from it and she didn't any longer care to. During her long years of exile she had made her terms with it; had learned to accept the fact that it would always be there, huge, obstructing, encumbering, bigger and more dominant than anything the future could ever conjure up. And at any rate she was sure of it, she understood it, knew how to reckon with it; she had learned to screen and manage and protect it as one does an afflicted member of one's family. Newton Free Library Bulletin Newton Free Library, 1913 The Ideology of Women in the Fiction of Edith Wharton, 1899-1920 Jean Turner, 1975
