NEW YORK UNIVERSITY

Abstract

A partial replication of the Averbach and Coriell study on short-term memory in vision was carried out employing six Ss, with a stimulus array consisting of a 2 x 6 matrix of letters. Three delay intervals of 50, 100, and 150 ms. between letter matrix and bar marker were employed. The results failed to confirm the findings of Averbach and Coriell and showed that delay interval over the range examined had no effect on recognition accuracy.

Problem

In a recent paper Averbach & Coriell (1961) report on a group of experiments designed to demonstrate a mechanism of short-term storage in the visual system, and the decay, readout, and erasure of information in such a visual storage system. Since their model of visual storage is based on experimental findings employing only three Ss, it was felt desirable to replicate in part, at least, some of their procedures, and the present report is a preliminary step in this direction.

Specifically, Averbach and Coriell presented a 2 x 6 matrix of letters and followed this array at varying delay intervals with a bar marker above or below one of the letters in the matrix. Their findings clearly showed that recognition accuracy of the letter indicated by the bar marker dropped from approximately 75 to 30%, when the bar marker was delayed from zero to 200 ms. The present study employs a 2 x 6 letter matrix and three delay intervals, 50, 100, and 150 ms., to assess the effect of delay interval on recognition accuracy.

Method

A three field tachistoscope (Scientific Prototype, Model GA) was used to present the stimulus arrays. Each array consisted of a 2 x 6 letter matrix presented on a 5 x 7-in card and viewed at a distance of 44 in. Capital letters, consisting of the 20 consonants and "y," 5/16 in high were used. The 2 x 6 matrix field was 2.5 x 1 in. Each of six different Ss was tested 96 times, at each of three different delay intervals, 50, 100, and 150 ms., between letter matrix and bar marker, on three different days, for a total of 288 trials per S. Twenty-four different arrays, each consisting of two rows of six randomly chosen letters, were presented four times to make up the 96 trials for each of the three testing sessions. The bar marker appeared with each of the 12 positions in the 2 x 6 letter matrix eight times, but its sequence of appearance was randomized. The letter matrix always appeared for 80 ms. followed by a bar marker which also appeared for 50 ms., at one of the three delay intervals, i.e., 50, 100, or 150 ms.

Results

The results for the six Ss are given in Fig. 1, which shows recognition accuracy (i.e., percent correct, corrected for chance using the formula suggested by Averbach and Coriell) as a function of the delay interval between the letter matrix and the bar marker. Examination of Fig. 1 shows no systematic effect on recognition accuracy as a function of delay interval and in fact, when the data for the six Ss are averaged the resulting function is essentially flat, leading to the conclusion that delay interval, over the range examined, has no effect on recognition accuracy.

Discussion

The results of the present study are in marked contrast to those found in the Averbach and Coriell experiment. We find no evidence of a systematic drop in recognition accuracy for increasing delay intervals, as found by Averbach and Coriell. However, our results are in marked agreement with a study by Eriksen & Steffy (in press), in which no drop in recognition accuracy occurred as a function of delay interval. Further, another recent study by Eriksen & Collins (1964) failed to find any evidence for an erasure process of the type described by Averbach and Coriell. On the basis then of
