- 1. The educational system creates these groups and contributes to being the main problem. Schools act like a social filter, if students feel that the system pushes them into a group of conformist individuals who conform to the most popular, dominant line. This heterogeneity can often have subtypes, but the school creates the basic heterogeneity. Educational institutions have different types of students, but students feel that they have to conform to different groups. Educational institutions, the government and culture are the main social forces that create subtypes in society, as students' learning shows.
- 2. The educational system has gathered together organized groups. History and geography, school subjects, history and politics, science, literature, math, etc. characterize groups, ideas and common goals. There are groups that have their own goals, interests and activities, and a specific group culture that can be observed, and can influence the learning process.
- 3. Promote a review of these social groups in society.
Society has three large groups. These groups are: the working class, the middle class and the upper class. These groups are often quite separated, with no common interests.
- 4. Educational groups are also important. Some groups are more open to new systems, others are more closed. Some groups are more open to new ideas, others are more closed. Some groups are more open to new ideas, others are more closed.

- As more and more participants grew involved in this, the process evolved from a top-down, hierarchical approach to one that was more bottom-up and fluid, a process that was characterized by a decentralized, participatory and iterative of planning and design that brought diverse voices together and resulted in a representative outcome.
- This was the case, and, as a result, the design and implementation of the program was a collective effort.
