

Programming the BetaBrite® LED electronic sign

by Gary Peck

It seems like nearly every microcontroller project needs some kind of user display. The LCD is one of the most common types of small displays microcontroller designers use for a number of reasons: LCD's are inexpensive, use very little power, and have many sources. Many LCD's have backlighting systems to allow viewing in a wide range of lighting conditions. Plus, a number of companies make interface boards to convert the parallel interface of an LCD into a much simpler serial port connection and protocol.

So it would seem like the LCD is the ideal display to use, and often it is. But what do you use when your microcontroller (or even your PC) needs a really large and bright display that can be seen from across the room? At that point you may need to consider an LED display. But large LED displays are not as common as LCD's, and most are expensive industrial units.

The BetaBrite electronic message display

Fortunately there is a large LED display that is not so expensive, and that is the BetaBrite
