Animal Sponsorship is Futile

Do you give money to people who dress up as a cute, friendly marsupial? Or maybe your work donates to 'Save the Dalmatians'? Well, if you do, you are wasting your money. Recently, a rival paper ran an advertisement inviting readers to sponsor an animal at Eastern Park Zoo. Yes, we do need to protect our environment, but is this the best way?

The modern world, with all its greed and over-development, has slowly stripped our precious animals of their natural habitats. Last year, miners ripped 3.7 million tonnes of resources out of the earth. Yet these are some of the same businesses being asked for help now. Saving one cute and cuddly koala in a zoo is deemed more valuable as a public relations gimmick than saving acres of eucalypt forest. It is all too hypocritical, you will agree. Exactly what animals are seeking sponsorship: funny little fairy penguins wearing top coats and tails, or cute baby wombats burrowing into nanna's old cardigan? What happens to all the less desirable creatures? Are they any less valuable? The biters and the slitherers – they deserve protection too. Without them, our food chains and our ecosystems simply collapse. In 2008, the estuarine crocodile was listed as 'possibly threatened', but no one is jumping up and down about protecting them.

Many people say that any money spent on conservation is beneficial. That has proven not to be the case. The $1.1 million spent on building a new enclosure for numbats cannot possibly be as valuable as spending the same amount on regenerating natural habitat to save a whole colony of numbats in the wild. Any money spent should impact the entire species, not just a few.

So when you

Introducing Editorials

The introduction to an editorial has a clear opening statement that follows on from the title. It could be a rhetorical question or a statement based on opinion. For example:

What would you do if one day you were told you couldn't have a haircut? It's your hair, you own it, why not get it cut? Well, this is the situation facing many youth-careers. Hairdressers who were informed last week that it will soon be illegal to cut down their own hair.

Get up off those couches. Turn off the television. Get outside and enjoy the fresh air. According to a recent study by the CIBCC, there are three simple steps to getting and maintaining a healthier you.

1. Can you think of some other good introductions to an editorial? Choose some interesting current topics or issues to help you get started.
