

TROPICAL BIODIVERSITY

This subject matter intersects with the geographic ecology section but also with our earlier discussion of diversity – you might find it useful to return to that. Following are a series of questions primarily related to the readings on tropical biodiversity but also regarding some material from the chapters.

Note that sometimes I ask the questions separately and sometimes they are wrapped up in the essay question I describe at the end.

1. As we move up to larger areas, extinction still eliminates species, but the force that adds species on continents is _____.
  - Processes that generate biodiversity
    - Speciation rate
    - Colonization (usually not as important in larger scales)
2. Is there higher species diversity in the tropics? Look over the demonstrations of this in the chapters and lectures.
  - Greater resource diversity and availability due to warm climate
  - Reduced demand
  - Competition is reduced
  - There is less specialization because of abundant resources, and niches can pack more closely together
3. What are some different theories about large scale diversity – let's stick with the terms in the Inga paper as opposed to those in Chapter 22. You should know these pretty thoroughly.
  - Museum Hypothesis
    - Less disturbance, less extinction
    - Measured time since the last disturbance
    - If the environment in which species emerge does not change too much over time, then it will preserve those original species (harbors old species)
  - Cradle of diversity Hypothesis
    - Adaptive complex from biotic complexity
    - High speciation – niche separation
    - Tropics are a crucible of evolution in which adaptive complexes arise owing to the biotic complexity of tropical forests.
    - New life evolved more frequently
  - Refugia Hypothesis
    - Ice age allopatric speciation
      - Geographic isolation followed by genetic isolation)
    - High immigration rates
    - Tropics do not have ice ages, but they do feel their effects (cold temperatures shrinks niches, causing allopatric speciation)
    - Would support that tropical species diversity is a recent event as ice-age fragmentation acted as a species pump.
