- Many power sources and electricity networks are now being called 'supergenerators' and 'supergrids'.
 - Increasingly complex systems, which require greater system control at both national and regional levels, are being developed, tested and implemented. Such systems bring together the generation, and their propagation greatly assist the development of supergrids, especially with regard to the European Union's Trans-European Networks for electricity.
 - There is a growing demand for energy efficiency and energy conservation.
 - There is a demand and expectation of the delivery of energy at lower costs, lower prices and lower risk.
 - Supergrids are seen as being the answer. This article summarises the main points for the reader.
