He was fascinated by the expressive possibilities of the human body and found himself to be the most readily available model. Like a good actor, he used his own face as a resource for studying life.

In most of his self-portraits, Rembrandt viewed himself straightforwardly and with the same curiosity that he brought to his other human subjects. DWELLING expresses this alienation and absence. The artist inserted personal mementoes into a traditional Korean-style dress and hung it over a pile of books, maps, and photographs. Inside the dress, barely visible, is a script from a Korean poet, which gives voice to the loss of identity. The
