The first thing to notice is that the text is written in a single column. This is a common feature of printed books, but it is not a feature of most manuscripts. In fact, the vast majority of medieval manuscripts were written in two columns, left and right, facing each other. This is called a 'double column' or 'two-column' layout. It was used in medieval manuscripts for several reasons. One reason was that it allowed more text to be written on a single page, which was important for books that were expensive to produce. Another reason was that it made it easier for readers to follow the text, as they could see both lines of text at once. This layout was also used in printed books, but it was eventually replaced by a single column layout, which is what we see in this manuscript.
