

BLACKBURNIAN WARBLERDendroica fusca*

A treeline warbler common in spruce-fir forests in oaks in the Appalachians. The bright orange throat and head markings of the male are distinctive. Female and young have similar but paler markings; the only other eastern warblers with this face pattern are the Black-throated Green (p. 262) and Yellow-throated (p. 264). In West compare with female and immature Townsend's (p. 262). Song is very high and thin, often with an exceedingly high-pitched ending, 4-6/min.

CHESTNUT-SIDED WARBLERDendroica pensilvanica*

Common in deciduous brush. The yellowish crown and distinct chestnut side markings identify both male and female in spring. The only other warbler with chestnut sides is the Bay-breasted. Immatures are usually without chestnut marks, but can be told by their bright unmarked green back, white underparts, and narrow eye ring. Song is very similar to Yellow Warbler's, but typically the next to last note is repeated and the final note is slurred downward, 5-8/min. Another song lacks this ending.

BAY-BREASTED WARBLERDendroica castanea*

Fairly common in northern coniferous forests. Chestnut sides, throat, and crown and buffy patch back of head are diagnostic of the spring male. The female is much duller. Fall birds often lack all traces of chestnut and are very similar to fall Blackpolls; the Bay-breasted is more buffy below, especially on the undertail coverts, and has black, not buffy yellow, legs and feet. Song is a very high weak one, like the Cape May's, but notes are more often run together rather than distinct.

BLACKPOLL WARBLERDendroica striata*

Abundant in coniferous forests. Spring male has distinct black crown, white cheeks, and white throat, which distinguish it from the Black-and-white (p. 252) and Black-throated Gray (p. 264). Struck-back, buffy yellow feet and legs, white undertail coverts, and prominent white wingbars on the olive wings are good field marks of the female and all fall birds. This is an abundant migrant in the Atlantic states, often seen on low branches. Song is high, thin, and distinctive; either fast or slow, but of separate notes in a monotone, often loud in the middle, soft at both ends, 4-7/min.
