Each of the major documents from Mesopotamia indicates the presence of many if not all of the following factors: provenance in an historical period experiencing dramatic political developments, a decisive battle where the presence of the god/s expressed by the vanguard motif is clearly the victorious force defeating the foe, a resultant emphasis on the supremacy of one monarch with the corollary exaltation of a major deity. In this way motifs of divine presence are also intimately connected with the human leader The vanguard motif is also frequently accompanied by a motif expressing the fearful reaction of the enemies of the god and or king Less often explicit in the literary texts is the use of physical objects as representations of divine presence in battle Their loss and subsequent return are often important signs of the religio political events that form the background of specific texts Along with the construction of temples they also may illustrate and embody the cultic celebrationn of divine exaltation and serve to ensure that divine presence is not ephemereal On the basis of this data we have demonstrated that there is a distinct configuration of motifs that reappears at various times and places under similar historico political conditions and that this configuration serves a propagandistic function In part 1 the typology of exaltation was discussed within its Ancient Near Eastern context In part 2 we have repeatedly found a a number of striking parallels in the Old Testament From summaries 1 and 2 Spon's Landscape Contract Manual Hugh Clamp,1986 This indispensable manual for landscape work covers the documentation and management of landscape contracts It is written for all those involved in the landscape industry Planning Edward David Mills,1985
