Abstract The authors examined the effects of a 12-week, 100% body weight (BW) resistance training program on the muscle strength and body composition of 12 sedentary, middle-aged men. The program consisted of three sessions per week, each including a 10-min warm-up, 10-min stretching, and 40-min resistance training. The resistance training was performed using a free-weight squat, a free-weight bench press, a free-weight deadlift, and a free-weight row. The program resulted in significant increases in muscle strength and body composition. The authors conclude that a 12-week, 100% BW resistance training program is an effective means of improving muscle strength and body composition in sedentary, middle-aged men.

Abstract and background: There are a number of reasons why the use of a single, one-dimensional measure of health-related quality of life (HRQL) is inadequate. The purpose of this study was to compare the use of a single measure of HRQL with the use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL in a clinical trial. Methods: A clinical trial was conducted in which the use of a single measure of HRQL was compared with the use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL. The results of the trial were compared with the results of a similar trial in which the use of a single measure of HRQL was compared with the use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL. Results: The results of the trial showed that the use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL was more effective than the use of a single measure of HRQL. The results of the trial also showed that the use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL was more cost-effective than the use of a single measure of HRQL. Conclusions: The results of the trial suggest that the use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL is more effective and more cost-effective than the use of a single measure of HRQL. The results of the trial also suggest that the use of a multi-dimensional measure of HRQL is more reliable than the use of a single measure of HRQL.
