Treatment Recommendations for Substance Use Disorders Kianna Fiscus-Morgan, 2019 Attachment is a process of development that evolves in ways that influence and organize motivational emotional and memory processes in connection to one's significant caregivers Studies have shown that the organization of attachment relationships during infancy is associated with later emotional regulation social relatedness and to the overall development of the self Researchers have found a link between early attachment styles and the development of substance dependence indicating that addiction is an attachment disorder Research suggests that individuals who struggle with developing intimacy and closeness with others may seek out a method such as substance use to self soothe in times of distress Likewise individuals who have not established positive and secure interpersonal relationships with others are more likely to seek out that refuge in addictive substances This study combines the existing research on attachment and addiction therapy to establish recommendations for effective treatment of substance use disorders based on the attachment needs of the clients Self help programs such as Alcoholics Anonymous focus on the role of a sponsor and social support in order to maintain recovery which is a crucial part of substance abuse treatment Thus treatment recommendations tailored to help individuals form close relationships with others are crucial to long lasting recovery Treatment strategies that utilize strong and supportive social networks specifically focusing on the role of family relationships are of particular importance as family support and family attachment patterns may be inherently lacking for individuals with substance use disorders Issues and Controversies on File, 2001
