The hypothesis that the frequency of use of a word is dependent on its frequency of written appearance, as in most experimental and non-experimental studies, is called the frequency effect. However, some researchers have argued that frequency is merely a proxy for other factors such as semantic, syntactic, and orthographic information, and that the frequency effect is a by-product of these other factors. The frequency effect is also called the word frequency effect. The frequency effect is a well-documented phenomenon in the literature. It has been found that the frequency of use of a word is positively correlated with its frequency of written appearance. This correlation has been found in a wide range of languages and in a wide range of contexts. The frequency effect has been found to be a robust phenomenon that is not easily explained by other factors. The frequency effect is a well-documented phenomenon in the literature.
