For example, the liver is a metabolic organ, meaning that it performs many different chemical reactions. It is also a storage organ, because it stores many different substances. The liver is also a regulatory organ, because it helps to maintain the body's balance of different substances. These three functions of the liver are interrelated, because the liver performs many different chemical reactions, stores many different substances, and helps to maintain the body's balance of different substances.

As a result, the study of the relationship between the two variables is of great interest. The present study attempts to examine the relationship between the two variables by using the data of the 2000 U.S. Census.
