Leadership Practices, Self-efficacy, and Role Expectations of Community College Academic Leaders During Change Elizabeth Kristen Gandt Spagnola, 2022 Higher education institutions in the United States currently face ongoing challenges and difficulties beginning in 2008 with the fiscal crisis which created a need for education and retraining for man demand for greater accountability by institutions and a fundamental shift in the perceived value of higher education Academic leaders of post secondary institutions in particular community colleges have encountered this shift in society s view of the value of a college degree and now see a demand for greater skills and employability within the workforce For academic leaders to meet these new expectations an understanding of leadership styles focused on the characterization of their self-efficacies and a knowledge of the institutional role expectations is needed to lead during times of uncertainty and change. The study employs an explanatory single case design to establish to what extent an academic leader's perception of their leadership practices, self-efficacy, and institutional role expectations influence change. Defining the role of the academic leader in higher educational institutions will enable community colleges to remain sustainable and competitive in unparalleled economic and societal times. The participants of the study are individuals with the titles of dean within the academic affairs division from a selected two-year public community college in the Northeastern region of the United States. The study will employ Bolman and Deal's Leadership Orientation Survey. Bolman noted to first identify the leadership orientation practices of the selected academic leaders followed by semi-structured interviews to provide a deeper, more detailed data. Bogdan and Biklen (2007) explained that interviews generate rich data filled with words that reveal the respondents' perspective, p. 96, affording the interviewer the ability to gain a general understanding of the range of perspectives on the subject, p. 96. The significance of the study will provide academic leaders and senior community college administration an understanding of the relationship of the role of leadership, its practice, and self-efficacy and the perspective necessary for academic leaders to offer a direction for change.

Black Women's Pathways to Executive Academic Leadership: Lessons from Lived Experiences Crystal Chambers, Ph.D., 2023-09-19

Over half of college presidents (55%) are planning to step down from their positions within the next five years. This impending change in leadership, particularly among underrepresented groups, presents an opportunity not only to diversify leadership but more importantly, address the need for leaders who understand the experiences of racially and ethnically diverse student bodies, who can identify barriers that mask merit, and who can garner support to make campuses welcoming and inclusive spaces for all. Through personal reflections and insights, the authors in this volume provide a comprehensive analysis of the experiences and challenges faced by Black women leaders in community colleges, HBCUs, and predominantly White institutions (PWIs), and offers a comprehensive practical and research-based exploration of executive academic leadership, providing valuable insights and guidance for current and aspiring leaders in higher education and the importance of traditional and nontraditional leadership pathways to an ever-changing academic environment. Included is a powerful call to action for institutions of higher education to prioritize diversity and inclusion in their leadership structures and to recognize and support invaluable contributions of Black women leaders in shaping the future of education.
