the public domain and the private domain are the two main components of a sustainable urbanization. The former refers to the public space, which is a common resource that can be used by all members of the society. The latter refers to the private space, which is owned by individuals or groups and can be used for personal purposes. Sustainable urbanization requires a balance between these two domains, ensuring that both the public and private spaces are used in a way that promotes social equity, environmental protection, and economic development. This balance can be achieved through the implementation of various policies and strategies, such as zoning regulations, public transportation, and green infrastructure, which encourage the use of public spaces and discourage the use of private spaces.
