theoretical framework and example of the relationship between the two. The theoretical framework is developed in the first section, and the example of the relationship between the two is developed in the second section. The third section concludes the paper.

Both the W and W' models are based on the same underlying assumptions, but they differ in the way they handle the data. The W model is a parametric model that assumes a specific functional form for the relationship between the variables, while the W' model is a non-parametric model that does not make any assumptions about the functional form of the relationship. The W model is more likely to be biased than the W' model, but it is also more likely to be consistent with the data. The W' model is less likely to be biased than the W model, but it is also less likely to be consistent with the data.

However, the most important factor in determining the success of a new technology is the quality of the people who are using it. In this case, the quality of the people is reflected in the quality of the software they are using. The software must be well-designed, easy to use, and reliable. It must also be able to handle a variety of different types of data and be able to process them quickly and accurately. In addition, the software must be able to integrate with other systems and be able to communicate with them effectively. Finally, the software must be able to be updated and upgraded as new technologies and requirements emerge.

ANSWER

Consequently they developed their own methods, and the best men of their day were the ones who did the best work. The result was that the best work was done by the best men, and the best men were the ones who did the best work. This is a natural consequence of the fact that the best men are the ones who do the best work.
