network technology which are designed for vehicle to vehicle and vehicle to infrastructure connectivity for moving vehicles The four chapters in this section provide an introduction to VANETs routing services and system architecture Future Internet Services and Service Architectures is complemented by a separate volume Advances in Next Generation Services and Service Architectures which covers emerging services and service architectures IPTV context awareness and security Autonomic Service Architecture for Next Generation Networks Ramy Farha, Efficient Service-aware Network Algorithms Ananya Das,2010 The internet supports a wide variety of services with varying levels of urgency For example health care and business services are likely to be more time critical than entertainment services Service Level Agreements SLAs are formal contracts in which service providers and customers typically negotiate service terms such as the customer s requirements Based on the customer s specific needs service providers should efficiently manage network resources to better satisfy the needs of all customers For example some tele medicine applications require highly reliable service at all times However some entertainment applications such as video streaming with buffering can tolerate short periods of downtime with little disruptions to the customers Therefore if network resources are scarce service providers can conserve these resources for customers with stringent needs by providing less than full service to customers with flexible requirements We consider a dynamic network setting where customer requests arrive over time and are not known in advance Events such as link failures and congestion also occur over time In this unpredictable setting it is difficult to determine the optimal decision for each request Therefore it is important to develop efficient and intelligent solutions using statistical estimates that approximate the distributions of events such as request arrivals and departures and link failures For some critical applications customers may require full service in the event of a link failure However for some less critical applications customers may be more flexible in their service needs if the service is offered at lower costs We first consider two settings where customers are willing to accept less than the full amount of required bandwidth as long as the overall service is typically high In the first setting customers accept a requested fraction of the bandwidth rather than the full amount in the event of a link failure In the second setting customers are willing to accept an expected level of bandwidth rather than an absolute amount For both settings we develop efficient routing algorithms that exploit these relaxed reliability requirements In addition to the customer s requirements SLAs typically also include the fees paid to the service provider for meeting these requirements and the penalties incurred to the provider for violations Since the service provider wants to maximize profit it is important to determine the most profitable requests We develop and study routing algorithms that aim to satisfy customer reliability requirements while maximizing the overall profit to the service provider We propose an efficient approach that judiciously determines which requests to accept and routes these requests to maximize expected profit Finally we consider link congestion in a setting where links become congested and uncongested based on a known probability Since traversing a link in its congested state requires more time than in the non congested state the goal is to minimize the expected routing time

We analyze algorithms to minimize this expected routing time
