It is possible that genetic heterogeneity among these families contributes to the observed variation in allele frequencies. In fact, the frequencies of the various haplotypes observed in this study are consistent with those observed in other European families. However, the frequency of the h1 haplotype was higher in our study than in other European families, which may indicate a founder effect or a difference in the ascertainment process. The frequency of the h1 haplotype in our study, which was not observed in previous studies, may be due to ascertainment bias.

differentiate the movement of plasma membrane following such sympathetic tone. The membrane permeability and excitability should also undergo the modifications. Sympathetic innervation may produce the changes and such the changes between the two states that the production of action potentials as passing of excitation potential across these cause the switch of conduction to a different conduction from normal to fast and reverse, which results in

These are often referred to as surrogate or proxy outcomes. However, such measures should not be interpreted as reflecting any individual's personal health status, as they only reflect aggregate health status. Thus, these measures represent the health of the population as a whole. The more healthy a population, the lower their average probability of having a particular disease or condition.
