Abstract The purpose of this study was to determine the effect of a 6-week training program on the physical fitness of sedentary middle-aged men. The subjects were divided into two groups: control and experimental. The experimental group underwent a supervised exercise program consisting of aerobic and resistance training. Physical fitness was assessed using a battery of tests including heart rate, blood pressure, body composition, and functional performance. Results showed significant improvements in all measures for the experimental group compared to the control group.
