From PDB to protein structure prediction

Structural bioinformatics is concerned with the analysis of the PDB.

The PDB contains a large number of protein structures, which are used to predict the structure of other proteins. This is done by comparing the structures of known proteins with the structure of the protein of interest.

Protein structure prediction

Protein structure prediction is the process of predicting the structure of a protein from its sequence. This is done by comparing the sequence of the protein with the sequences of known proteins.

Protein structure prediction is a difficult task because the sequence of a protein is not enough to predict its structure. The structure of a protein is determined by its sequence, but it is also influenced by its environment.
