

The median of the distribution of small cars selling is $8, which is still better than average. The median of the distribution of midsize cars selling is $9, which means there is still more than half of them that sell for less than $9. And the median of the distribution for large cars is $6, meaning 50 percent of them sell for less than $6. Comparing the car by the median, it proves that small cars are still better than average and better than midsize and large cars. The interquartile range for small cars is .75, for midsize cars it's .75, and for large cars, it's .75, so the range for large cars is .75. In fact, if a small car has a really high rating of 10, while the other two have 1 or even 0. This also measures the spread of the entire data set. The small car has a total of 10, and the 10 ratings is 10, so its contribution can prove that in the future, that small car has the most "good" between 10% and 10%, and the midsize and large cars.
