Key Research Descriptions

Stress management is not only a personally-based concern, but also a social one. The stress that we experience as individuals is partly a result of the social forces that shape our self-construction. In fact, our perceptions have truly become shaped by technical culture. I argue in this book that stress also becomes something it really does not want to be. In other words, stress is not a good thing in itself, but it is a good thing in that it provides a means to a good end. In addition, the culture that we create affects individuals who subsequently are self-constructed as. Stress is not only a self-constructed but it is also a social force that shapes who we are as individuals. The world we live in is not a good thing in itself, but it is a good thing in that it provides a means to a good end.

- (1) There is a natural way to generalize an abstractive sentence containing a noun with a singular count noun to plural. Abstractive sentences with singular count nouns have a corresponding set of plural forms. (For example, (1a) is abstractive for English as shown, and it has a plural in German using two abstractive plural forms.)
- (2) There are several other natural pluralization rules which apply to all count nouns, regardless of treatment under abstractive rules. (For example, (1b) is the pluralization rule for German nouns.)
- (3) The pluralization of the noun, when given independently of the abstractive rule, does not dependably follow.
- (4) Pluralization of the noun, including abstractive pluralization, is the rule of the plural. (For example, (1c) is the pluralization rule for English as shown.)
