- Increases confidence that the study has the required environmental coverage.
- Allows more time-specific and more sensitive assessments of changes in the environment than is often possible with the current more 'coarse' model that averages over months and seasons.
- It requires less data than the current site selection process to update them. For example, each model run requires data for about 1000 sampling sites.

These results suggest that there are multiple sites, multiple pathways, and multiple mechanisms that may contribute to the development of resistance to the various chemotherapeutic agents. These may include mutations in the genes that code for the enzymes involved in the synthesis and metabolism of the drug, changes in the drug distribution, changes in the drug metabolism, changes in the drug excretion, and changes in the drug target sites. These changes may be either permanent or reversible, and they may be induced by the drug itself or by other factors such as genetic factors, environmental factors, or other drugs.

These findings suggest that we can learn a great deal about the properties of a family's social network by examining the connections that the family maintains with other families.
