

bending couple M creates normal stresses in the section, while the shear force V creates shearing stresses. The former is determined in this chapter, using the flexure formula (5.2), while the latter will be discussed in Chap. 6.

Since the dominant criterion in the design of beams for strength is usually the bending stresses in the beam, the determination of the maximum value of the bending moment in the beam is the most important factor to be considered. To facilitate the determination of the bending moment in any given section of the beam, shear and bending-moment diagrams will be drawn, using free-body diagrams of various portions of the beam (Sec. 5.2).

An alternative method, based on relations among load, shear, and bending moment, is presented in Sec. 5.3. To maintain the interest of the students, most of the problems to be assigned are focused on the engineering applications of these methods and call for the determination, not only of the shear and bending moment, but also of the normal stresses in the beam.

Section 5.4 is devoted to the design of prismatic beams based on the allowable normal stress for the material used. Sample Problems and problems to be assigned include wooden beams of rectangular cross section, as well as rolled-steel W and S beams. An optional paragraph on page 334 describes the application of Load and Resistance Factor Design to beams under transverse loading.

Section 5.5 introduces the concept of singularity functions and shows how these functions can provide an alternative and effective method for the determination of the shear and bending moment at any point of a beam under the most general loading condition. While this section is optional, it should be included in the lesson schedule if singularity functions are to be used later for the determination of the slope and deflection of a beam (Sec. 9.6). It is pointed out on page 348 that singularity functions are particularly well suited to the use of computers, and several optional problems requiring the use of a computer (Probs. 5.129 through 5.136) have been included in this assignment.

Section 5.6, which is optional, is devoted to nonprismatic beams, such as forged or cast beams designed to be of constant strength, and rolled-steel beams reinforced with cover plates.

Chapter 6 Stresses in Beams and Thin-Walled Members Due to Shear

It is shown in Sec. 6.1 that a transverse load creates shearing stresses as well as normal stresses in a beam. Considering first the horizontal face of a beam element, it is shown in Sec. 6.2 that the horizontal shear per unit length q , or shear flow, is equal to VQ/I . This result is applied in Example 6.01 to the determination of the shear force in the nails connecting three planks forming a wooden beam, as well as in Probs. 6.1 through 6.8.

In Sec. 6.3 the average shearing stress τ_{ave} exerted on the horizontal face of the beam element is obtained by dividing the shear flow q by the width t of the beam:

$$\tau_{ave} = \frac{VQ}{It} \quad (6.6)$$

Note that since the shearing stresses τ_{xy} and τ_{yx} exerted at a given point are equal, the expression obtained also represents the average shearing stress exerted at a given height on a vertical section of the beam. This formula is used to determine shearing stresses in a beam made of glued planks in Sample Prob. 6.1 and to design a timber beam in Sample Prob. 6.2. Problems 6.11 through 6.14 and 6.21 through 6.24 call for the determination of shearing stresses in various types of beams.
