Following the issuance of the government's order to prohibit smoking inside the construction industry, the union members refused the prohibition because they felt that the ban discriminated against non-union workers. A court-appointed mediator learned of the ban and suggested a mediation session. After an unsuccessful mediation session, the union members filed a lawsuit with the court. The court appointed a mediator to facilitate the mediation session. The mediator met with the union members and the employer. The mediator learned that the union members were concerned about the health of their members and the safety of the construction site. The mediator also learned that the employer was concerned about the cost of the ban and the potential for lost productivity. The mediator facilitated a series of sessions between the union members and the employer. The sessions focused on the health and safety concerns of the union members and the cost and productivity concerns of the employer. The mediator helped the parties to identify common ground and to develop a mutually acceptable solution. The parties agreed to a compromise that allowed smoking in designated areas of the construction site. The compromise also included provisions for the health and safety of the workers. The mediator facilitated the implementation of the compromise and monitored the progress of the mediation. The mediator was satisfied with the outcome of the mediation and the parties agreed to the mediator's report.
