Evaluating Wireless Carrier Consolidation Using Semiparametric Demand Estimation Patrick L. Bajari, 2006 The US mobile phone service industry has dramatically consolidated over the last two decades One justification for consolidation is that merged firms can provide consumers with larger coverage areas at lower costs We estimate the willingness to pay for national coverage to evaluate this motivation for past consolidation As market level quantity data is not publicly available we devise an econometric procedure that allows us to estimate the willingness to pay using market share ranks collected from a popular online retailer Amazon Our semiparametric maximum score estimator controls for consumers heterogeneous preferences for carriers handsets and minutes of calling time We find that national coverage is strongly valued by consumers providing an efficiency justification for across market mergers The methods we propose can estimate demand for other products using data from Amazon or other online retailers where quantities are not observed but product ranks are observed Since Amazon data can easily be gathered by researchers these methods may be useful for the analysis of other product markets where high quality data are not publicly available National Bureau of Economic Research web site
