

1.1. What Research Questions Can Emerging Policy-makers Answer?

1.1.1. The policy context

Emerging policy-makers can benefit from an understanding of the policy context in which they are operating. This includes the broader political context, the political culture and the political system. These factors can affect policy-makers' ability to take effective action and implement their vision of policy solutions. These factors can also affect the effectiveness of policy-makers and influence their credibility, reputation and leadership. This requires an understanding of the political system, political culture, political institutions, political processes and political actors, as well as the political context in which they are operating.

1.1.2. The policy-making process

1.1.2.1. Policy-making institutions

Emerging policy-makers need to understand the government they will be working with, as well as the institutions they will be interacting with, in their policy-making. This includes the executive, legislative and judicial branches, as well as the civil service, political parties, interest groups and other stakeholders. Understanding these institutions and their dynamics is crucial for effective policy-making. Emerging policy-makers must also understand the context of their institution, including the political culture, political processes and political actors, as well as the political context in which they are operating.

1.1.2.2. The policy-making process

Emerging policy-makers need to understand the policy-making process and the policy-making institutions they will be working with. This includes the executive, legislative and judicial branches, as well as the civil service, political parties, interest groups and other stakeholders. Emerging policy-makers must also understand the context of their institution, including the political culture, political processes and political actors, as well as the political context in which they are operating.

Emerging policy-makers need to understand the policy-making process and the policy-making institutions they will be working with. This includes the executive, legislative and judicial branches, as well as the civil service, political parties, interest groups and other stakeholders. Emerging policy-makers must also understand the context of their institution, including the political culture, political processes and political actors, as well as the political context in which they are operating.

Emerging policy-makers need to understand the policy-making process and the policy-making institutions they will be working with. This includes the executive, legislative and judicial branches, as well as the civil service, political parties, interest groups and other stakeholders.
