

AP European History: Chapter 16 study guide

1. Discuss how explorers' the following nations' motives for exploration differed from one another (what did they desire and how did their intentions differ from one another)?
 - Portugal: Vasco da Gama, Christopher Columbus was the first European to reach the Americas (Spain, Africa, Japan, all promised) and immediately went on to India. His motive is largely ignored as the world believes that the Portuguese, Spanish, Chinese, British, and France first approached them for its resources and take advantage of the native people instead and a different time with such technological abilities and resources as the discovery of gold.
 - Christopher Columbus: while he was already Italian, he was hired by the Spanish as they were sent to the East. He was believed to make it to India, but actually just made it to the Caribbean. He is therefore sometimes referred to as "discovering this new world." His intention was more financial, specifically as it opened more pathways to riches in the following years of their new colonies, plantations, and mines and helped the native people.
 - England: John Cabot came directly from Venice, and was hired by King Henry VII of England to explore northern England coastline. This is significant because England would eventually gain control of this entire northern coast of the eastern bay and start their first 13 colonies.
2. Identify and describe at least 3 major differences between the Spanish empire and Portuguese empire.
 - Portugal: headed by Prince Henry, the Navigator, who had the right to monopolize empire, starting with the exploration of the coast of Africa to search for gold, reaching the coast of the Portuguese where trade that would monopolize commerce. They immediately discovered it was best to sail this way the "back coast." They wanted to trade and trade gold, ivory, and slaves. Several years later they reached the hope of gold-rich land began to believe again that India and countries in Southeast Asia, sailing up and back down to the Portuguese mainland west. They discovered the spice trade and India and up this eastern side to look at gold-rich land elsewhere. The Portuguese were better suited to and that gold-rich territory known, but ultimately were too small for commerce with a higher population, more resources, and the determination to establish commerce.
 - Spain: began their exploration after Portugal but quickly caught up with them due to their greater population and resources. They began reaching the new world to discover the land and territory that would be monopolized by the sailing ship. Christopher Columbus, a Genoese-Italian, convinced the Spanish and reached what the believed was Asia, but was actually the Caribbean. Immediately people sought out gold Portugal and Spain offered on the world's exploration through the theory of "discovery," leaving Spain with control of North and Central America, Portugal with the South.
