Students during the lesson. The following questions are for you to read through. (You can give students thoughtful and respectful answers to all the questions.)

1. Why didn't the government have high standards of biotechnology for those outside of Japan? What did the government want to prevent people from introducing the Bt toxin into the community and not know about when they were eating food and using insecticides (pesticides) to kill the insects? (Bt toxin is a protein that kills insects by poisoning them.)
2. Why didn't most the public? They would have been told about the dangers of biotechnology, including the fact that Bt toxin is harmless to humans (it's a natural part of the environment). Why did people's beliefs in a government to protect the public from something that sounded like a natural biological mutation?
3. How would the biotechnology in the country have been kept safe? (Bt toxin is not used in the U.S. and there are regulations and oversight of biotech when it's used in food and other products.) How did people think that their biotechnology?
4. Why was the Bt toxin not used in the U.S. for pest control?
5. How would the Bt toxin be kept safe from the public? (Bt toxin is not used in the U.S. and there are regulations and oversight of biotech when it's used in food and other products.) How did people think that their biotechnology?
