These efforts to disseminate the concepts of environmental thought in China and to link environmentalists to decision-makers in the central government, although limited in their effectiveness, nevertheless, served as an important step in the environmental movement. Thus the efforts to disseminate environmental thought in China between 1978 and 1988, while not always fully successful, nevertheless, did have some limited influence over environmental thought in the government and some environmental organizations, while others did not have much influence. Overall, environmental thought in China during this period was not very strong, and the government and scholars did not fully understand environmental thought. If this situation continues, then environmental thought, environmental education, and environmental legislation will not be able to fully develop in China.

Because of the potential for damage, it is important to understand the risks associated with these materials. The following table summarizes the potential risks associated with various materials used in construction, including the types of damage they can cause, the materials they are commonly found in, and the measures that can be taken to mitigate these risks.

It has become increasingly important to evaluate the more liberal attitudes. Thus, I have chosen, rather than focus on more recent readings, an older perspective. Several scholars have been critical of the way Johnson reads this chapter, and Johnson's original interpretation, with its emphasis on the "moral" nature of the chapter, has been widely accepted. I have chosen this interpretation, as it is the one that has been most influential in the field, and it is the one that Johnson himself has chosen to emphasize in his own interpretation of the chapter. The author's primary focus is on the chapter's concern with the nature of the human being, and the author's focus is on the chapter's concern with the nature of the human being.
