

of the 1990s. The following statement from the 1997 Annual Report of the National Institute of Justice, for example, reflects this concern:

From a cognitive perspective this often constitutes "discrepancy detection" (the process of noticing the difference between one's own thoughts and what is actually occurring). For example, if a person has been told that they are not good at public speaking, they may notice themselves becoming nervous, sweating, and fidgeting, and then interpret this as evidence that they are not good at public speaking. This cognitive process is often referred to as "catastrophizing" because it tends to focus on the negative aspects of the situation and ignore the positive aspects. This cognitive process is often referred to as "catastrophizing" because it tends to focus on the negative aspects of the situation and ignore the positive aspects.
